The Myth

Orpheus was a Thracian poet and musician, whose lyre could charm beasts and make the trees and rocks move. According to the prevailing legend he was son of Apollo and the Muse Calliope. When his wife Eurydice died, he descended to Hades and so pleased Pluto by his music that the god allowed him to lead her back to earth on the condition that he should not look behind him until he reached the upper world. But through the the anxiety of love he broke the condition, and Eurydice, who was following him, vanished again among the shades. In his obstinate grief, Orpheus withdrew to the wilds of the mountains where a troop of Thracian maenads tore him limb from limb. Still sweetly singing, his head was thrown into the river Hebrus, whence it was carried to Lesbos where it was buried.

EVERYBODY NEEDS LOVE

Everybody needs at least a little love, baby,
At least enough to maybe get by on,
A hand to hold, A mouth to feed,
A head to rest, A shoulder to cry on.

Everybody needs a little love,
Yeah, we all deserve a little love.
Cause without it we would never find
The peace of mind
It takes to see what's up above.
Everybody needs love.

Everybody's gonna come along,
All you gotta do is sing a song,
It's so easy just for you and me to feel free
And realize there's nothing wrong.

Everybody needs at least a little love, baby,
At least enough to maybe get by on,
A hand to hold, A mouth to feed,
A head to rest, A Shoulder to cry on.

Everybody needs a little love,
All it takes is just a little love,
It's so simple just to open up,
And let it out
And feel free to stand up and shout
Everybody needs love.
